It's the largest edible fruit native to North America, but it's frequently called America's secret fruit. Its flavor might remind you of something tropical. It's a little like eating a papaya, and like many tropical fruits with distinctive and sometimes acquired tastes, it can't be transported very well. You're better off growing it on your own, and in so doing, re-discovering the primordial delight of eating perfectly ripe fruit directly from the tree.

This mystery fruit is the Pawpaw, but it hasn't always been a secret. Pawpaws were cultivated from time immemorial by Native Americans, and George Washington allegedly loved eating them for dessert, chilled. So then why have so many people never heard of, let alone seen (or actually eaten), a pawpaw?

Easy-bruising pawpaws have a short shelf life and don't fit the business model of modern big agriculture: growing adapted varieties of fruits and vegetables which can be picked unripened and shipped across the country and across the globe.

A pawpaw is a little like a green tomato — if you pick an heirloom tomato off the vine before it's started to ripen, it will never ripen correctly (and you don't want to eat one that's hard — it won't taste right). When a pawpaw's texture resembles a ripe peach or avocado, with a little give when you press lightly, that means it's ready to eat, and preferably right away.

The flavor of a pawpaw is comparable to a blend of banana and pineapple, maybe with a hint of melon and mango. While this certainly sounds delicious, it takes some effort to prepare it for eating. First, you have to remove the skin; you can use a knife or a potato peeler, but it's easier to just cut off one end, squish out the fruit and remove the large brown seeds which run through the center — winding up with ready-made puree, plus seeds to plant. Don't eat the seeds — they're slightly toxic.

Pawpaws grow from the Great Lakes down to portions of the Florida Panhandle. In 1541, conquistador Hernando de Soto's expedition recorded Native Americans growing and eating pawpaws in the Mississippi Valley. The members of the Lewis and Clark expedition ate pawpaws for pleasure, and, for a period in Missouri in 1806, subsistence. John James Audubon painted yellow-billed cuckoos on a pawpaw branch. Early European settlers enjoyed pawpaws for centuries, spreading them as far west as Kansas. And even though they had to clear pawpaw trees to create farmable land, immigrant settlers savored pawpaw fruit — often the only fresh fruit available nearby. There are towns named Paw Paw in Michigan, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Oklahoma.

It's also important to understand that pawpaws don't propagate very well naturally — very much the opposite of an invasive species. According to the National Park Service, "Pawpaw is self-incompatible, which means that pollen produced on a plant cannot pollinate flowers on the same plant. Instead, to produce fruit, a pawpaw flower must receive pollen from flowers on another tree," which may be some ways away. "(Wild) pawpaw trees in a patch are often genetically identical and connected underground by roots (and thus, in biological terms, are a single plant)." It takes two genetically different trees to cross-pollinate, and thus, grow fruit every year.

So if you find a patch of fruit-bearing pawpaw trees while in the woods, it's a sign that sometime in the past, they were planted. There's a patch of pawpaws in Parkwood's Old Growth area, and another, just east of Parkwood along Northeast Creek, which might date back to Native American settlement.

If you're interested in planting and eating pawpaws, now's the time to start some online searching. There's been a resurgence of pawpaw fans, producing frozen pulp, selling seedlings, brewing beer (yes, pawpaw craft beer!), lots and lots of recipes, and fruit available at farmer's markets during the short harvest period around September (not all fruits on a pawpaw tree ripen at the same time). Newer pawpaw cultivars are producing better flavor, fewer seeds and larger fruits.

As a small landscaping tree, there's a lot to recommend pawpaws: seasonal color, deep burgundy flowers from March to May, dark green leaves that turn bright yellow in the fall. Reading up on some of the information links below may give you ideas about bringing this "obscure backwoods" tree and its fruit out into the open, so to speak.

Carolina Roller Derby - An Introduction

On a recent Sunday morning, athletes begin to arrive at their practice warehouse in Apex to prepare for tryouts for Carolina Roller Derby's 22nd season.

Skaters don their gear — quad roller skates, helmets, wrist guards, elbow and knee pads, and mouthguards — sitting in a series of plastic chairs that line a plain white wall. Above them, the wall is adorned with posters from game days past, some from as early as 2004, featuring venues like Dorton Arena, Jelly Beans, and Wheels. The current league comprises athletes and volunteers from across the Triangle, including here in Parkwood, and as far away as Pittsboro, New Bern, Fayetteville, and Wake Forest.

In the ensuing two hours, the athletes are tested on their abilities — stops, sprints, skating form, stance, communication, teamwork, gameplay, and drive — with coaches and captains taking notes at the center of the venue. Nearly 40 skaters showed up for their chance to make one of the league's competitive rosters, making it the largest group of skaters to try out since Carolina Roller Derby (CRD) made its return to the track in 2022, following a pause due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

One of the founding members of the Women's Flat Track Derby Association (WFTDA), CRD is a volunteer-driven 501(c)3 nonprofit. CRD seeks to empower individuals to expand their physical and mental strength, create an inclusive environment, and give back to the local community.

The league is composed of four teams. Two travel rosters, the All-Stars (A team) and the Bootleggers (B team), compete across the southeast and beyond to advance in the WFTDA rankings. Two home teams made up of just CRD players, the Dogwood Destroyers and the Box Turtle Bruisers, face off regularly in an exhibition-style matchup for bragging rights.

How does roller derby gameplay work? It definitely doesn't look like the roller derby you might remember from the 1970s and 80s! Think of it like NASCAR meets rugby.

This type of roller derby happens on a flat surface, with the track in a shape of an ellipse. The game is played in two, 30-minute halves. Each team fields five skaters during a jam (the period of play), which can last up to two minutes. There are four blockers and one jammer, who is the only player who can score points. A jammer scores one point for every person they pass after their initial lap.

The most exciting and difficult part about roller derby is that teams are essentially playing offense and defense at the same time, trying to help their jammer get through the pack of skaters, while preventing the other jammer from making it through.

It's one thing to read about it, and it's a completely different thing to see it in person. See our 2026 season schedule to the right.

Our strength is in our community: We are always looking for new and veteran skaters, officials, volunteers, fans, sponsors and partners! If you are interested in attending a game or learning more about how to participate with our league, visit www.carolinarollerderby.com or follow us on Facebook and Instagram, @CarolinaRollerDerby.

We hope to see you trackside in 2026!
